Keymacro creates macros that run on a specific key of the keyboard. This is a very useful feature that enables you to run special programs like for example, a web page on your computer without having to open your favorite browser. It is not possible to make an infinite keymacro. So you can not run your favorite program everytime you press a specific key. How to make Keymacro: Go to Start > Programs and you will see the name of the program you want to run. Double click on the program and a windows will open. In the properties window, search for "run" and click on "Enable Macros" Select "yes" and click on ok. Select the desired key on the keyboard and click on the "OK" button For every key you select, a new macro will be created. For example: To run google, just select the "g" key and click on "OK". And if you want to create a button to open a web page on your computer, you select the "f10" key and press "OK". This process is only limited by the maximum number of macros that your computer is able to handle. New: General option Now it is possible to choose different cases for the macro: General: It enables you to select the page you want to open in case the macro is a button for example. By default, it is open Google. Key: It enables you to select a specific key or more, if you want to create more than one button for example. Note: If you have a mac, I advise you to try this. I selected "f10" and I pressed "OK" and it worked perfectly. New: Speed Options This option is activated only if you select the "General" option and the key you want to create a button for example. Key options: If you want to use a keyboard shortcut, select the "Key:" option and select a key on the keyboard. If you want to use a combination, select the "Key:" option and then the combination you want to use. For example if you want to select a web site without opening your favorite browser, you can select the "f10" combination and click on "OK"

SUMMARY: In the General section, you can select the name of the program you want to run when
